Source material for Question 1Section 21 Theft Act 1968

- (1) A person is guilty of blackmail if, with a view to gain for himself or another or with intent to cause loss to another, he makes any unwarranted demand with menaces; and for this purpose a demand with menaces is unwarranted unless the person making it does so in the belief—
 - (a) that he has reasonable grounds for making the demand; and
 - (b) that the use of the menaces is a proper means of reinforcing the demand.
- (2) The nature of the act or omission demanded is immaterial, and it is also immaterial whether the menaces relate to action to be taken by the person making the demand.
- (3) A person guilty of blackmail shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

R v Collister and Warhurst (1955)

The two defendants were police officers. They intimated to the complainant that he would be prosecuted for an offence. They arranged to meet him the next day and told him the report of the offence would not occur unless he failed to turn up for the meeting. At the meeting one of the officers asked the complainant if he had anything for him. The complainant handed over £5. The defendants were convicted of blackmail and appealed contending they did not make any demand.

Held: The convictions were upheld. The demand need not be express but can be implied from conduct and circumstances.

Treacy v DPP (1971)

The defendant posted a letter to a person in Germany containing a demand with menaces. She posted it from England and it was received in Germany. She argued that the demand did not take effect until it was received and therefore she could not be tried in England as the offence was committed in Germany.

Held: The House of Lords held the demand was made as soon as the letter was posted.

R v Harvey (1981)

The three defendants had given £20 000 to the complainant for a consignment of cannabis. The consignment, however, turned out to be worthless. In response the defendants kidnapped the complainant's wife and child and threatened to seriously harm them unless he returned their money. The trial judge directed the jury that threats to commit serious criminal offences could never be regarded as 'proper'. The jury convicted them of blackmail and they appealed on the grounds of a mis-direction.

Held: The convictions were upheld. The trial judge was wrong not to leave the question of belief that the demand was proper to the jury. The Court of Appeal was satisfied that a jury properly directed would have inevitably convicted.

R v Lambert (2009)

The appellant was owed money by Aaron. He phoned up Aaron's grandmother and pretended to be Aaron. Posing as Aaron, he claimed that he had been tied up and that his captors were demanding £5000. He was convicted of blackmail and appealed contending that since in the making of the call he had not made any threat towards Aaron (as he was posing as the victim of threats) neither was it in his power to carry out any such threat.

Held: Conviction upheld. There is no requirement that the person making the demand is to be the one who carries out any of the threatened action or that the demander is in a position to carry out the threatened action.
