Section A

Answer Question 1.

Sociologists disagree about which methods produce the best results in sociological research. Positivists prefer to use quantitative methods, such as questionnaires, structured interviews and experiments. They may also use quantitative secondary data, such as official statistics. Secondary data is information that already exists and has been gathered by other people or organisations.

Positivists argue that sociology should be as scientific as possible and so they prefer methods that allow the researcher to measure human behaviour and record the findings in quantitative form. Interpretivists, on the other hand, favour the use of qualitative methods, such as participant observation and unstructured interviews, as well as qualitative secondary data. Interpretivists believe that qualitative methods produce data that is high in validity.

- 1 (a) What is meant by the term unstructured interview? [2]
- (b) Describe two advantages of using secondary data in sociological research. [4]
- (c) Explain why positivists favour the use of experiments in sociological research. [8]
- (d) Assess the interpretivist view that qualitative methods produce data that is high in validity. [11]

Section B

- 2 Explain and assess the view that an individual's identity is shaped by social forces beyond their control. [25]
- 3 'Data produced using participant observation is of little value in sociological research.' Explain and assess this view. [25]
